Whether Mr. GUERITZ has disobeyed the Canon we cannot say; but if he has, it is a Canon hard on the consciences of the conscientious, and the elergy should be relieved from it. We are not writing offensively to the Union:—we would not knowingly write offensively to say one, least of all would we write that which might grate harshly on the hearts of sorrowing relatives or friends, but it is crued to compel a elergyman to read the Burial Service over the bodies of persons who have lived in avowed antagonism with the Church and with the Church's Creed. It is virially took them to bestow the Church's amendion on the antagonism, and that is what no Canon should give power to enforce. We think, therefore, that the Union have no cause of complaint, and that there is inconsistency on their part and on the part of the Whig Examiner in endeavouring to the part of the Whig Examiner in endeavouring to the part of the Whig Examiner in endeavouring the part of the Whig Examiner in endeavouring the strain service is required, not, however, in the direction that would be agreeable to those "liberal" gentlemen who are for punishing Mr. GUERITZ.

Mrcu as Agricultural Societies are lectured and scolded and abused, there can be no doubt that they are doing good, and that slowly but certainly they are intrissing a spirit of remulation among those they are designed to beinefit. Preof of this is seen in the premiums won at the show of the West Carbery Society by persons such as those whose names we published yesterday. Small farmers are difficult to be got at. They do not move readily, nor is it easy to convince them of how much their welfare is dependent on exertion, or to direct exertion aright when they can be roused to tt. They are taught, unlargely, to look with suspicion on everything proposed to them, told it is for the benefit of their landlors they are asked to do it, and thus deterred from venturing on the only wave of immersion that and the search of their landlors they are asked to do it, and thus deterred from venturing on the only wave of immersion that a surface of the contraction of the for the benefit of their landlords they are asked to do day of improving their condition. Where, lowever, they turn a deaf ear to evil councils, listen to men whose interests, after all, are bound up with their own, and take advantage of the opportunities af-forded by Agricultural Societies, they learn that it has been their misfortune that they lagged so long behind, and that earlier attention to what their own sense should have use them to be for their extensions would have use them to be for their characters would have use them. ntage would have put them still further be advantage would have put them still further be-fore those who are even yet waiting to see what their awakened activity will do for them. They have but to go on, then, to find themselves better year by year, and to have the satisfaction of secing their example influencing others, and drawing them out of the inertness and indifference which keep where they are.

out of the incriness and indincrence which keep them where they are.

The persons whose application was preferred by Mr. SmrrrI are of a different class, wealthy enough, in fact, to form a Society for themselves, though apparently not sensible of how much they might be benefitted by subscribing handsomely to the County Society and enabling it to do for them something handsome in return. It is with large, not small, farmers they should be competition. Much as we hear from knavish declaimers about distress and all the sills that spring from misgovernment, they have contrived to get together no inconsiderable sums of money, and to be, peculairily, better off thun many a landowner, and better able to affort the expenditure necessary for successful competition whether in breeding or in tillage. With the landowner, therefore, not with their neighbour more restricted in holding and in means, should their competition be.

It is not amiss here to allude to what Mr. BEAMISH has been doing as an improver. The practical man is the man for the farmer. As to treatises, we have them without number; but what use does the farmer make of them? Here and there a man of enterprise may peruse them, for such a man is on the look-out for every hint that he can turn to account, but men of enterprise are few, and tillness of the ground have little taste for books. Anything, however, that shortens and in unfavourable seasons enables them to get their crops speedily down and in, so of value to them, and in this respect Mr. BEAMISH appears to have severed the thanks voted him on the motion of Mr. DUNSCOME.

The Mayor had a hard flight for his vote, and for the present the vote is left with him; but thes
